The rights office cited reports of scores of monks and protesters having been rounded up and taken to a local military camp, which the government has alleged to be a "rehabilitation centre". "The release of many of the detained seems to be the result of bargaining with the authorities," Luther said. Amnesty said most of those arrested were monks. Authorities in some areas were responding to the protests by barricading roads and blocking access to commercial hubs. "The army has imposed a curfew in several townships in the restive Rakhine state and have reportedly sealed off several areas in Yangon city," the rights office said.
