In this case, the influence on the first-order rate constant would be subtle (Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"}\*C\*). Although the kinetics for some proteins might be simple enough to precisely account for the first-order kinetics, the slopes for the other proteins ( $\sim 0.5$ – $0.8$  for ExoIII,  $\sim 1.1$  for GFP, and  $\sim 2.5$  for \*E. coli\* RecBCD) are much lower than expected if the experimental conditions were simply changed and the first-order rate was the dominant reaction (Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"}, \*B\* and \*C\*). In our study, the influence of the first order reaction is even greater when the final substrate is the isolated product, albeit less distinct than the case of the enzyme reaction. In the case of exonuclease III, the effects of the first-order reaction may be accounted for by combined effects of increased lifetime of a substrate due to an overall increase in enzyme concentration (through addition of exonuclease III and TCEP), and increased likelihood of product release due to increased substrate concentration. However, this appears to be the case for GFP and the RecBCD complex (Table 3{ref-type="table"}). Thus, the changes in the first-order rate constants that we see appear to be predominantly due to first-order changes in the second-order rate constants, for example as a result of alteration of the active site and/or the secondary structure of the enzyme (e.g., folding of the linker domain). An even more challenging example is provided by the DNA ligase reaction, where GFP and exonuclease III produced a large change in the measured rate constant for the enzyme reaction at low substrate concentration (Fig. 5{ref-type="fig"}\*B\*). This transition could not be accounted for by a simple first-order change in the enzyme activity at low substrate concentration, which would not shift the  $k_{cat}/K_m$  nearly enough to account for the observed differences
