This is only possible on devices running Kindle 4. Using an improved method for quantification of intracellular transferrin receptor in intact cells and permeabilised cells, we have found that the level of transferrin receptor on normal human lymphocytes is about 13,000 sites/cell, which agrees well with the estimate derived from the measurement of sedimentation coefficient. When cells were permeabilised with saponin, the number of transferrin binding sites was 17,500 sites/cell. This preparation preserved transferrin receptor (TfR) completely, and specific binding could be measured with intact cells. In both normal and permeabilised cells, bovine serum albumin (BSA) and antibody to TfR inhibited both the binding of transferrin and the receptor-mediated transferrin uptake. The total cellular TfR pool could be depleted, suggesting a receptor recycling mechanism. The rapidity of transport of TfR from the surface of intact cells suggests that it is a simple, but unusual, receptor with rapid turnover. The Oregon researchers were the first to show how bacterial infections can trigger a migraine, and researchers at Kaiser Permanente in California recently discovered that migraines aren't caused by genetics alone. Together, the two studies suggest that infections can affect the brain, which may explain why migraineurs have more neurological issues than non-migraineurs. How could an infection affect the brain? Bacteria in the gut or nose can travel to the blood vessels under the eyes or brain and make the tiny blood vessels leak, leaking plasma into the brain. Some of this plasma also includes antigens from the pathogen, which could then trigger a brain response in someone who's susceptible. To researchers' knowledge, this leaky blood-brain barrier has never been directly linked to migraines. But the leaky blood-brain barrier isn't the only reason that infections might trigger migraines. Migraineurs can also have abnormal immune system function, and some drugs — including those used to treat migraines — can further exacerbate this dysfunction 1cb139a0ed
