IS-IS is a mature and extensively tested IOS network routing protocol developed by the Industrial Systems and the Intelligent Systems Lab of the University of Pennsylvania. One of its characteristics is that it is able to support large area networks of heterogeneous and mobile elements. IS-IS is based on the concept of the 'ad-hoc' network, and this leads to a division in two groups, the interior and the exterior. The interior network consists of the devices attached to the IS-IS router. Exterior devices (such as network controllers) can only connect to the interior routing domain. These devices are connected to the IS-IS router through an Access Router Interface that acts as an interface for IS-IS. The structure of the IS-IS protocol is derived from the OSPF protocol. IS-IS is RFC 1992. The IS-IS protocol provides a number of features like automatic neighbor discovery, routing table updates, routing label forwarding, forwarding update, and multi-homing support. All IS-IS features are cascaded, and in the IS-IS protocol there are
