In the past, various methods of dispensing collapsible containers of drinkable liquids have been suggested and utilized. In the past, collapsible bottles were welded along a top seam to form an oval bottle having an upper end and a lower end. The bottle has a conventional seam welded around its sidewall. One such bottle formed by a conventional process is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 1,913,061. U.S. Pat. No. 4,071,124 illustrates the other type of conventional process. In this process, an upper wall section and a lower wall section are welded along a bottom seam, and then a top wall section is welded to the upper wall section at the top. In each of these prior art processes, it is desirable to form a bottle having a substantially rectangular cross section, so as to provide a large surface area of the bottle for receiving liquid. However, in each of these prior art processes, a substantially cylindrical bottle is formed. The
