Is there an idiomatic way of checking if an object is empty in Rust? I'm familiar with using "." to check if a type's field is nil, but it seems that for more complex types like Option or Box, it should be possible to check if it is either None or None: let foo: Option = None; let bar = Box::new(None); // I'm searching for println!("{:?}", foo.is_none()); // false println!("{:?}", bar.is_none()); // true A: A rough approximation would be to test if there is a value of some sort in the Option or Box. foo.or_else(|| "") bar.or_else("") This will never panic, unless foo is None or bar is None, and it will return an Option if the value can be found in the Option or Box. A: Or you could use is_none() on the Result of the expression foo.or_else(|_|

Design and production The "Model 98" was a licensed copy of the British Vickers machine gun design. Originally produced by the Western Cartridge Co. (now part of Remington Arms), and not Vickers, it was purchased by the Ordnance Department of the U.S. Army and renamed the Model 98. It was an improvement on the M1903 Browning machine gun; the gas mechanism was housed in the buttstock, greatly improving the kick-like recoil of the M1903 Browning. The Model 98 holds five cartridges in an internal drum magazine (as compared to the Browning's six). The drum and feed mechanism are attached to the left side of the buttstock (hence the "left-hand feed" designation), so the feed unit is covered by the breech end of the buttstock (the "right-hand" designation). The Model 98 also differs from the M1903 Browning in other ways: the left-hand feed unit is fully enclosed, to prevent fouling and damaging of the actions, and the extractor and ejector are in line, attached to the left side of the feed unit. The Model 98 used a new style of.30-06 cartridge (M107A1). The Model 98 was produced from 1940 through 1946, when it was supplanted by the M2 machine gun. Production totalled 706,145 units from 1940 through 1944 0cc13bf012
