Communication channels often require added hardware or software to prevent one sender from flooding a channel with a high number of messages to another sender. These techniques are used to prevent worms and viruses from sending large amounts of unwanted data to other computers on a network. These techniques are commonly referred to as congestion control. It is well known that the Internet protocol (IP) provides a reliable structure by which a communication channel can be established and used by computer systems to exchange information. However, it is desirable in many instances to control the transmission of data over an IP-based network because of the inherent inability of the IP protocol to detect a flood condition or excessive transmission rate on a TCP connection. These problems are enhanced in systems where an application running on a client system is not under direct control of a system administrator. In other words, a user can break up a file, for example a picture taken with a camera, into multiple smaller files for transmission over an IP-based network, only to have a worm or virus attempt to transmit the whole file. For example, when a user wishes to send a picture file stored in a client computer to a destination, the user will typically select a file-sharing application such as that available from the Microsoft Corporation (MS) Corporation and then open the selected file on a file-sharing client application, such as Microsoft Windows Explorer. At this point, the user is faced with a dilemma of whether to open and send the file to the destination or save the file on the local hard drive. It may not be possible for the user to accept the file and save it at the destination, whereas opening the file for transmission leaves the client computer vulnerable to network flooding and virus attacks. As such, the ability to
