Email Font Size Still perusing the Internet for articles on the Gulf Coast hurricane on June 16, 2006, I found the article "Home Invasion During Hurricane: Gulfport Gets Hit Hard." After reading about the home invasion of a child whose older brother stayed behind during the storm when his mother had to evacuate with him, I found this article describing the home invasion of a deceased homeowner whose home was raided shortly after his death as the storm struck. In the article, the homeowner's neighbors were upset at the robbery, but the house was actually empty because the victim was ill and didn't live there anymore. His landlord had rented the home from the victim's wife, and the wife's mother was renting it to the landlord. The murdered victim had a habit of showing his guns to his neighbors. He had told his neighbors, "One of these days, I'm going to shoot you for no apparent reason." One of the victims recalled thinking the shooter was likely his landlord. The murder-robber likely knew that the deceased homeowner was a crack addict, which meant that he would be unemployed, homeless, and completely without resources. As soon as the murder-robber had finished the robbery, the house was being vacated as soon as possible. He then falsely told the other neighbors who called the police that the man had been shot after causing a disturbance by rebuffing a police officer trying to talk to him. The crime was called, and two hours into the robbery, the three men charged with robbery at the house were arrested; they had entered the house through an unlocked kitchen window. In a recent phone interview with a reporter, one of the assailants explained that he, along with a friend, had robbed a house. They were having a nightmare. The suspect remembered the victim complaining, "I got to get rid of this gun." He also remembered the gun being unloaded,
