still emerging, but it certainly appears to be like a real-time or near-real-time situation. The idea here is that the league is striving to eliminate the issue of having to play a game live if you're on the road, and instead, the game will be simulcast to others if you're not at home. This isn't just a one-off thing either. As detailed by Adam Schefter of ESPN, the league has been working to make the playoffs and the Super Bowl available by computer over the past few years, with the Super Bowl being played next year being the first of these to be held. The move here extends this approach to the conference championship games as well. As we've seen with the Patriots in the past, some teams may not exactly appreciate being streamed on the internet, but this seems like a positive development as it allows teams to view the game live in the comfort of their own home without ever having to actually travel on a given week. It's also a way to attract fans who might have felt that the Super Bowl was an extra expense that they could live without. The most intriguing question, of course, is just what will happen to the replay window in these situations? If the league can work out the logistics in time for next year, will every NFL game be streamed live every week of the season? Or will they in effect be restricted to just the postseason? If this is the former, we might want to be careful what we wish for. One possibility is that the NFL could try to be a little more judicious in how and when it uses this new system, if they want to preserve their replay window. Even though the league has been saying that it 18, 2014. President Barack Obama is set to lay out his plan to fight Islamic State militants this week, but instead of going after the terrorists, he is focusing on the parents who support them. "The vast majority of parents want what's best for their children," Obama said during remarks Monday at a community college in the Dallas suburbs. "We all know that the jihadists recruit children to be human bombs. They teach them to pack explosives and show them how to make IEDs." The president has acknowledged that extremists in the U.S. have been able to do that because of a failure by the federal government to do enough to protect the country's borders. But he said that those who fight on behalf of terrorists will be prosecuted in the eyes of the public and the criminal justice system, though he did not specify how the Justice Department would try to catch them. "This is a fight we will win," he said. President Obama lays out his plan for fighting the Islamic State militants in a speech Tuesday. Jim Watson/AFP/Getty Images "We cannot close our doors to anyone who wants to change their life," he said. "But we have to make it very clear that the vast majority of people inside the Middle East did not support these terrorists, and they are living normal lives." Instead of a strategy to defeat the Islamic State, Obama promised to fight its ideology, and he used his speech to make that case. He said the extremists do not represent Islam and accused them of using the religion as a tool for "hatred and violence." "They did not write the book of tolerance and invite others to follow in their path. That's not the essence of Islam," Obama said. Obama said that a coalition that includes countries fighting against the Islamic State in the Middle East, Russia and the United States must continue to stand united. He
