The frame doesn't need to be white, you can change the color to fit your picture. Resize the frame until it fits your picture, and then export the frame to Polaroid (.prf) file. And with the provided demo pictures, I exported them using Paint.net's Colors docker to a.prf file and placed it in a folder called "Demo". Other than that, I have no idea how you can accomplish this, I never heard of or seen anything like it. A: You could do it with a program like Canvas-triggers (here). After converting the image to the required format, you can choose the size of the white border by changing the value in the options dialog. If you resize the canvas image before it is saved, you don't have the problem that the image needs to be cropped with border. L. ## What's New In Polaroid Frame?

is a docker image for Paint.net that allows you to add a customizable Polaroid Frame to images you create in Paint.net. The moment you add the Polaroid Frame you will be asked to choose a frame, if you select a frame it will be applied to the image and you will be asked to choose a color, after that Polaroid Frame will be applied to the image you just selected. While you are working in the right part of the image (inside the red dotted line) it will be decimated (broken) and it will be replaced by the Polaroid Frame you selected. If you select, or you drag an image outside the red dotted line the Polaroid frame will not be decimated (broken) and it will stay with the original image, but you will only have to choose a frame and the color. Q: How can I scrape a particular webpage from a longer list of websites using python? Let's say I have a longer list of URLs, each containing a separate webpage. How can I do a simple scrape of each of these websites and save the html to a local directory? I tried using Selenium, but it's slow and I'm only scraping a single webpage at a time. It's not a particularly elaborate webpage, but I'm hoping I can find a way that will work for this purpose. Any ideas? A: You can just use urllib.urlopen and lxml.html: import urllib.urlopen import lxml.html urllib.urlopen("").read() >>> 'Yahoo!You have received an email.View your mail' for url in ["yahoo.com", "google.com", "msn.com"]: xml = lxml.html.fromstring(urllib.urlopen(url).read())
