Italian dinosaur expert says he knows what 'wolfman' fossil is: Read all about it here. AN-1 (or iAnthus) has every reason to be proud of its research team. For such a small species, it's been responsible for a number of surprising finds and clues as to what dinosaurs actually looked like. Now researchers have discovered a new raptor species, identified as a small theropod, in southwest China. In the Journal of Vertebrate Paleontology, AN-1 has been described as "a small theropod from the Middle Jurassic of Nanxiong, southwest China". The bones, which were discovered in the Ganzhoujiawan site, are what is known as a hypsilophodont, a distinctive type of tooth shape common in large theropods such as tyrannosaurs. "The remains are exceptionally well preserved, enabling identification of the new species in detail," the researchers explained in a press release. "Little is known about the fossil record of hyperodious theropods in the Chinese stage. A discovery of new, small-bodied hypsilophodont theropods will not only enrich our knowledge of primitive theropod diversity but also of the evolutionary history of hyperodious theropods. Additionally, this discovery will provide the first direct evidence of hypsilophodonts in the Nanxiong area". The bones are being studied in detail, with a more detailed report published next month. AN-1 joins the ranks of other 'wolfman' specimens, and with the discovery we now know that hypsilophodonts were hugely widespread. The researchers are keen to emphasize the importance of the site in which the new find was discovered. "The first-time discovery of hypsilophodonts in the Ganzhoujiawan area," the team explains, "makes it one of the most important fossil localities from the middle Jurassic in China."
