A bizarre incident that unfolded when Munchkin Barajas was sitting by a window on a Capital Area Transportation Authority bus in Columbus with her 5-month old son, has now turned into a crime in the third week of July. The 50-year-old woman said she was nursing her baby when a man began to grope her in the bus. She was eventually able to move away from the man and get out of the bus, but made the incident report only to a supervisor a week after the incident. The alleged attacker was never identified or caught, but the case became a top news story. Today, the man allegedly responsible has been arrested and charged with fondling a woman in a moving vehicle or public transportation vehicle. Speaking to local news outlet WSYX-TV, Ms Barajas said the suspect had passed her again while she was on a bus yesterday. She also shared a message on Facebook in which she wrote "This happened to me. We need to make a change. THIS IS AMERICA! #MeToo." The case has highlighted tensions between mothers and fathers in public transit, with women's advocates, politicians and other professionals warning about the grim reality of the prevalence of men in public transport who allegedly grope, harass or even harass women as they sit by a window breast-feeding their babies.
