Not all mod hacks are 100% safe. Adobe InDesign CS4 free download full version Occupy Los Angeles (OLA) has had a long time to debate what it actually wants to accomplish. Some think it is about focusing on security while others think it is about challenging corporate control. Nothing matters, really, until you get your movement off the ground and you start to organize and mobilize your supporters for action. It seems to me that the movement has come into its own in this regard, as the Occupy Wall Street (OWS) movement has taken shape over the last couple of weeks. You can certainly understand why OWS is having this kind of impact, as there is a whole host of occupations going on around the nation, but this movement, which is largely leaderless, has been able to set a tone for the entire Occupy Movement. Roughly a week ago, Occupy LA decided that it wanted to be more than just an event. Now, it is a national movement and has taken off to the northeast on its crusade to bring democracy to the land of the free. I just moved to Los Angeles almost a year ago, so I am merely observing but certainly from a location outside of the fire zone. There is a great deal of energy here. There is a great deal of music at OLA and there are huge numbers of people occupying the streets, particularly where there are banks and supermarkets (this may be good or bad, but it is what it is). The crowds are not as big as at Zucotti Park, but they are growing and the pulse of the movement is so much stronger. Corporate media have a tendency to frame this so-called movement, but it is not. It is not a movement of fringe anarchists, it is a movement of economic liberals. It is not a movement of the "banksters" who haunt the streets of the City of Angels (or any other city for that matter), it is a movement of the people and that was always going to be the case. From the outset, OLA has been about having a vocal presence here in Los Angeles, even if it has not yet had the kind of energy that OWS has had. This is very different from the occupation of Zucotti Park. It does not have the "overnight" character of that event, which was the result of a successful protest. This is about people standing up to their government and their corporations to do what they have been
