The SPORE grant was awarded in August of 1994. The overall goals of the SPORE are to develop and evaluate clinical trials at the molecular level, to improve management strategies for patients with cancer, to enhance the total number of clinical trials at Johns Hopkins University, and to develop a cadre of translational scientists at Johns Hopkins to collaborate on clinical research and provide important research products and reagents to scientists nationally. The SPORE has four main focus areas, each with established institutional commitment and considerable institutional support and infrastructure. The focus areas are: Breast Cancer, Prostate Cancer, Cervical Cancer, and Brain Tumors. We are working to develop and evaluate clinical trials at the molecular level and developing new translational initiatives. These new initiatives include new translational research grants and clinical trials, a new outreach program and to develop a cadre of translational scientists at Johns Hopkins with a focus on early phase clinical trials. The projects listed are from all areas of the SPORE, which emphasizes interdisciplinary approaches. They address a broad range of
