. ~~~ jessejedim That's what it means. However, for the MacOS the requirement is on Apple itself to provide the data. So Apple has to make some choice like Apple will take a shot at the data and hope for the best, or Apple will never make that data available. Either way Apple has to make a choice. ~~~ michaelmrose It is a choice of no choice. I don't mean to deride your point but the fact that you're 'forced' to choose an option, yet the case is clear, is strange and thus not a choice. You cannot reduce the question of whether these available iTunes files are available to other users to the question of whether Apple is obligated to provide data or could refuse to provide data. I don't see any relevant analogy. As long as the files are available, I doubt anyone has any practical claim whatsoever. ------ snitko This seems to be another evidence that the music business is a dinosaur really. While Apple and all other big players have the data about what we are listening, they don't even bother going after it. They simply go for money and name recognition. They seem to think that like every government they should get something in exchange for their existence, while they themselves have more money than they could spend even in their whole lifetime and still have a few trillion more for them to spend. The moment you stop feeling pity for the old and greedy, you get ahead and with the future. ~~~ xenospn There are still lots of people and companies who absolutely _love_ dealing with crap like this. If you thought the music industry was a beautiful, entrepreneurial, entrepreneurial ocean of opportunity, you are absolutely and indubitably wrong. And nearly all musicians are part of it. How fun would it be to start to accumulate data on all the music we listen to? How fun to have some marketing algorithm subscribe to our interests, based on our communication with friends? It's not just the music industry. When's the last time you really tried to sell something to the product manager of your company? ~~~ ryandrake What data? Sure it'd be fun to have a system aggregate all your music purchases, but a lot of
