The cool thing about the AWS architecture is that you can just do whatever you want. If you want write solid SLOs, if you want write GUIs for your users, if you want to make a multiplayer map of asteroids and ship battles - do it! This is also the reason why it is so hard to get costs down. If it's your customers money, you might be very reluctant to play by the rules. If it's your hard work and your time, then you might be very reluctant to make it harder for the customers. ~~~ will > The cool thing about the AWS architecture is that you can just do whatever > you want. If you want write solid SLOs, if you want write GUIs for your > users, if you want to make a multiplayer map of asteroids and ship battles - > do it! ... And you will just have to pay for it. (which is what I'm a little upset about - guess I'm just fussy, as usual) ~~~ Narretz I find this notion a bit surprising. Like what you mentioned, you can't just do what you want, because the infrastructure is there to back it up. It's a well balanced equation, too. You don't want to be in situations where the service breaks because you loaded your database to quickly or failed to maintain SLOs etc. AWS does not offer a "cheap" service that is purely unlimited. If there is a risk that all your traffic will go to Amazon then your application will have to be faster and much more reliable. ~~~ digisign Again, I
