My users table has a username and email (no password). I'm setting up the authentication with Devise and it works perfectly when I use the username and password my application creates. But I want to use a customer id for the login. All the users have a customer_id and I want to associate the login with the customer id. What's the best way to do this? I have the following in my customer model: has_many :sessions, :class_name => 'User' has_many :users, :through => :sessions, :source => :current_user I'm trying to associate the user id with the customer id through the :current_user (one to many) relationship. In my application controller, I have this: protect_from_forgery def customer_session_params params.require(:session).permit(:current_user_id) end def user_session_params params.require(:session).permit(:current_user) end So when I try to log in with a customer_id, it's telling me that no id was sent. How should I associate a customer id with the :current_user? A: Assuming you have a has_many through relationship between users and sessions and sessions and customers, you can use the :source key for the :current_user to specify a custom source other than
