The Mental Health Branch of Queensland Health said it was only offering the amnesty so people in the region could receive free mental health services. However, the branch said it would not provide any services to people who took up the offer. Health Minister Steven Miles said the scheme was intended to tackle illicit drug use and was probably the "biggest cash for ash operation I've ever come across". "We don't want to normalise these activities, but we don't want illicit drug users to go to the streets," he told reporters in Bundaberg on Friday. "They're up to 40 times more likely to commit suicide. They're at least 40 times more likely to have psychotic illnesses. "We're providing an amnesty for people to go to a counsellor and have their issues worked through for free, and that has not happened yet." Mr Miles said the financial incentive was intended to encourage people to get help. "We're very conscious that if we're going to stop the drugs flowing, there's got to be some very good reasons why people want to change their behaviour," he said. "We don't want people choosing to be on drugs and then go to their doctor at some stage and be told the reason why they're being treated is because they were offered free treatment, when in fact that's not really the reason. "It
