It is well established that maternal hypertension can adversely affect fetal outcome. There is, however, little information available about the effects of chronic and asymptomatic fetal anemia on the fetal environment. In the present study, we evaluated the presence of intrauterine anemia in pregnancies complicated by chronic hypertension and in pregnancies without hypertension. Intrauterine anemia was studied in 170 women with chronic hypertension and in 236 normal pregnant women, all delivered at term. Anemia was defined as a hematocrit of less than 33 percent. A 25 percent reduction of fetal hematocrit was considered significant. The intrauterine conditions of fetuses with and without anemia in hypertensive and normotensive women were compared. The fetal hematocrit was reduced in fetuses of hypertensive women compared to normotensive women (27.2 +/- 3.0 percent and 31.4 +/- 3.7 percent, respectively; p less than 0.001). The rate of severe fetal anemia was significantly higher in fet
