A powered toothbrush generally comprises a head portion provided with a number of tufts and, at the centre of the head portion, an oscillating mechanism for swinging the tufts back and forth. A variety of toothbrush assemblies are commercially available. The object of the oscillation motion is to impart a brushing action to the teeth with the bristles of the tufts. A key problem with toothbrush assemblies is to ensure that the tufts are clean before being used. At the present time, the act of cleaning the tufts of the toothbrush is time consuming and can be potentially dangerous. This is because the tufts need to be cleaned whilst in a dry condition. However, whilst they are in a dry condition, the toothbrush may be mounted in the mouth of the user, which may be uncomfortable, and, in an attempt to remove a tuft of bristles from the toothbrush, a user may accidentally apply too much pressure to the toothbrush. In addition, all the bristles, even the bristles which are used for cleaning, do not always perform satisfactorily, particularly where there are tufts of bristles in the head portion of the toothbrush. There is a need for a toothbrush which can be easily and safely cleaned to provide a clean bristled surface. EP-A-0 819 488 describes a toothbrush with a cleaning brush and a cleaning pad. The cleaning pad is used to clean the bristles of the toothbrush and is preferably made of paper. However, although the bristles of the cleaning pad may be replaced, the cleaning pad, at least initially, has a limited life as it is generally used a number of times before needing replacement.
